MEASURING INFECTION - SAA READER

Gone are the times that your vet arrives, takes a blood sample and you have to wait for your results. Previously we used external laboratories to monitor what are called Acute Phase Proteins – mainly a protein called Serum Amyloid A (SAA). This protein rises and falls quickly when infection is present. The StableLab SAA reader gives us the ability to measure SAA on your yard in just 9 minutes!

SO WHY MEASURE IT? It is important to establish whether there is an infection and associated inflammation. SAA rises rapidly when infection is present, enabling us to use further laboratory samples to isolate what type of infection is present and be more precise when it comes to providing the correct course of treatment/advice. Due to the specific nature of SAA, consistent rises or falls enable us to carefully monitor how a patient is “coping” and whether a change in treatment protocol is required. We are very aware that some conditions require us to make quick decisions on how to manage a case and can sometimes be a matter of ‘life and death’ – therefore being able to make these decisions on the yard is imperative to us.
